As near to the gates of a city he rode, While the glorious sun all brilliantly glow'd, The good man discover'd, with eyes of desire, A mulberry-tree, in a hedge of wild briar. High up on a bough, might have tempted a brute, Large, glossy, and black, hung the beautiful fruit.

The curate was hungry, and thirsty to boot; He shrunk from the thorns, though he long'd for the fruit With a word he arrested his courser's keen speed, Then stood up erect, on the back of his steed; On the saddle he stood, while the creature kept still, And he gather'd the fruit, till he'd taken his fil

REMINISCENCES BY HON. O. H. SMITH .- A TIGHT FIT.

In early times there lived in Indiana a man by the name of George Boone, a descendant of the celebrated Daniel Boone, who should not be overlooked in these sketches, although I have not space to pay the same respect to many others whom I would be pleased to notice. George Boone would have stood well in those days when there were giants in the land. He was near seven feet high, with large bones and muscles; his hands were large, but his feet were beyond anything of the kind I have ever seen in length, breadth and depth. I can best give some idea of them by relating an incident that George used to relate with gusto, after he became one of our State Senators.

"I was about eighteen years of age when for the first time I took it into my head to go a sparking. One of my neighbors, a few miles off, had a large, pretty daughter, that I thought would just suit me. It was late in the fall, and the weather pretty cold; still, it was too early to put on shoes. The Sunday evening had come; I dressed in my best butternut colored suit, made some six months before, but soon found that the pantaloons reached only just below my knees, and my coat stretched over me as tight as a dried eel skin on a hoop pole. I started barefooted, wading the creeks and muddy bottoms till I reached the house. They were about sitting down to supper, and invited me. Sally sat by my side. We had mush and milk, and plenty of it. The old lady handed me a large bowl. I thought politeness required me to meet her at least half way, and stretched out my hand to take it; but I had made no calculation of the size of the table, the space between the milk-pitcher and the bowl, nor of the width of my hand. I struck the big milk pitcher on one side, and out went the milk over the table. Sally jumped up and went roaring with laughter into the other room. The old lady merely remarked, 'It will rub off when it gets dry,' and the old gentleman said there had greater accidents happened at sea.' But it was all over with me. I saw that all was lost. Not a word more was spoken. I saw nothing more of Sally. The clock struck ten. 'Mr. Boon, won't you wash your feet and go to bed?' said the old lady. 'Yes ma'am.'— 'Here is an iron pot-all I have suitable.' I took the pot, and found it so small that I could only get my feet into it by sliding them in sideways; but I got them in. and soon found them swelling tighter and tighter, until the pain was so great that the sweat rolled off my chin. The clock struck eleven. 'Mr. Boone, are you not done washing your feet?' 'What did this pot cost? I must and Iowa, it seems, the "prejudice of color" operates pieces, handed the old lady the dollar, opened the door, and never saw her afterwards. I met Sally at a husking several years afterwards, and as we met she roared out A FIGHT IN THE SENATE.

But the end of George was not yet. He grew up to be a man and a colonel, and, like Saul of old, was chosen to lead the people. He became a State Senator and an able debator. His figure was so tall and commanding, came up for debate, Ratcliff Boone, Lietenant-Governor, in the chair. The colonel was the leader of one side of the question, and a senator, about four feet ten, limbs in GEN.
